Excerpt: . . . ting Charles to the service of Cupid and Venus, granting him all the privileges of their realm and the assistance of their officers, and stating that they had received his heart in pledge as a surety for his loyalty. At this point the allegorical part of the French poem as we have it is interrupted, and the ballades begin; but a contemporary English translation, 1 apparently made from a lost MS. , carries on the narrative. The lettre de retenue Charles received with gratitude and humility, and promised life-long service. In exchange for his heart he asked for another--his lady's, since she had his. At this Love looked sad, and said he lacked wit in supposing his lady could give her heart to every one who asked it. She must have her choice; and Charless business was to devise ways of winning her in...
