Excerpt: . . . MR. DODDS OPENING SPEECH. Ladies and Gentlemen: We are met here to-night to honor a noble man. In doing so, we honor ourselves. To be an accepted friend of S. S. Packard is a certificate of character. I know well he does not desire any words of flattery or fulsome eulogy. He was never known to blush, yet he is a modest man, for all that. But one fact in relation to him, like a city set upon a hill, cannot be hid. He has, in his long and active life, been useful to his fellow-men to a most marked extent, and has long had a recognized position as a leader among educators and philanthropists. It is largely in recognition of this fact that this notable assemblage of his friends is gathered to-night, and he must permit us to speak of this characteristic of his life in moderate terms, yet with heartfelt appreciation; for we draw inspiration from the contemplation of his usefulness, and are thereby filled with stronger desires to make our lives more useful. I said we were met to honor a noble man. Possibly I would have included more of his characteristics if I had used instead that much abused term, gentleman; for such our guest emphatically is--a gentleman such as the angels referred to when they sang, Peace on earth to men of gentle will; a gentleman such as the Psalmist described: One who walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness and...
