Comparing the increase which had taken place in subjected and non-subjected districts, the utmost effect which might be attributed to the suspension was that, of a strength of 40,000, there had been 27 additional admissions per week. Without further information as to the stations from which troops had lately come--Egypt, for instance--it was impossible to say how much disease was to be ascribed to the change which had been made. Some part of the increase, however, might be explained by the circumstances surrounding the removal of troops to different places. He would not, therefore, give an assurance that the same practice would have been adopted if the Besolution had not been passed. With respect to the last Question of the noble Lord, undoubtedly there would be no departmental negligence during the Becess on the part of the Executive. Lord EUSTACE CECIL asked whether...
