Excerpt: .of her fresh, young beauty in the mirror. It is her gift to Morris, --her one return to him for the great offering of his love. She blows out the light and runs downstairs and out into the warm, silent garden. Mrs. Simpson has - run in at some neighbor s; Nan, with half a dozen other young people, has gone to the village to hear the baud play in the square before the hotel. The house is dark below; her father s study-lamp glimmers faintly through the closed blinds. Lydia sits down for a moment upon a seat and listens. The road is deserted, not a sound is to be heard. She idles down the path, stoops to smell at a clump of day-lilies, looks up and down the road, and comes slowly back again, humming a tune. Eight o clock strikes. So late? A-sudden fear sends a chill to her heart. If he should not come at all! The Rev. Aurelius clears his throat with a dry, rasping sound, causing her to start. She waits, waits, sometimes listening with every nerve tense; sometimes moving about, that the rustling of her garments may hide the plash of coming oars, then holding herself silent again to catch the faintest sound. At last a device occurs to her for passing the time until he comes. She will take a run in the meadow; by the time she is back again, he will be here. She...
